FEDERAL RESEARCH FUNDS CREATE IMBALANCE, SAYS EDUCATOR

Concentration of Federal research grants and contracts in a small number of universities is preventing development of needed research at other schools, O. C. Aderhold, president of the University of Georgia, contended in an address to the Southern Regional Education Board recently.

Federal funds now constitute about 75 per cent of the 2 billion dollars spent on research through universities and colleges, he said. During 1962 ten universities received 38 per cent of these funds; and the top twenty-five got about 60 per cent of all federal aid to research. Only three of these twenty-five are Southern schools. Further, the South, with one third the college-age population, produces only 14 per cent of the doctoral degrees granted; and much of the research done in Southern schools is a "hand-to-mouth gathering of isolated bits of information needed at the moment for a particular federally sponsored project" rather than basic search for knowledge.

Needed are, according to Dr. Aderhold, a more even distribution of research funds, allocation of funds for more basic research, and more generous support of the social sciences and humanities.
